Game Video game development is a very large software industry that focuses on the development of video games. Video game development is a multi-billion-dollar industry, and the U.S. alone spent over $4.1 billion on video game development in 2002. It is estimated that an average computer game costs in the range of $40,000 to $150,000 to develop and produce. Most commercial game development firms have released the source code of their games in an effort to open up the industry to the public. In recent years, game development has primarily been the domain of software companies. However, newer and more business-oriented game development companies have been created in the past few years. Media is made with video game software. It has become a phenomenon within the software industry, but it also has ties to the movie and music industries. Media's development has traditionally been done on the PC platform, and its earliest forms were primarily text-based. The appearance of "interactive movie" features in early video games fueled an interest in the development of non-text media. Classic "interactive movie" formats such as SNES Movie, Super Mario 64, and Sega CD or CD-i games created a demand for non-text video game media. Because of the relationship between the video game and media industries, game developers have used media tools for as long as video games have existed. A considerable amount of media is usually created by hand, with the aid of specialized multimedia development tools, such as Virtualdub, Pro Tools, and Adobe Premiere Elements. Despite the rise in the use of multimedia tools for production, the hand-crafted video format is still widely used for business, commercial, and educational reasons. Most professional video-editing packages contain tools for creating media, including general-purpose media editors and specialised tools for video manipulation. The advent of the Internet and a rapid increase in multimedia-related product development has caused the nature of media products to change. The Internet allows a tremendous amount of communication and interaction to take place, and this has led to the creation of many new media types. The Internet has changed the way media is created, distributed, consumed, and monetized. Indeed, it has completely altered the way media is sold, distributed, and consumed. Even traditional cable and satellite TV operations are beginning to come under the control of the Internet. In the traditional content distribution model, media was produced and distributed for other businesses or individuals that could pay for it. With the f678ea9f9e
